Chapter 3: Innocence

The teacher is talking but I don't hear a word. A mass of colourful posters decorate three walls of the room and I'm trying to understand something incomprehensible.

"Whites only! No Blacks! No Coloureds allowed!" The bold words are shockingly unnatural and strange.

Defiantly offensive labels adorn drawings of doors and buildings alongside public parks and seats. Some posters display an unfamiliar word, "Apartheid." Making sense of other student's work is proving impossible. Everyone else is listening to the teacher, apparently unperturbed by the disturbing imagery surrounding us all. When the bell signals the end of class the room empties. Quickly, I walk over to my classmate to ask what she thinks about the posters.

"Oh, that's what it's like in South Africa," she replies in a matter of fact way without stopping.

Another classmate hovers nearby stepping closer to confirm that "apartheid" really does exist. Emphatically, she tells me how awful it is. Her older siblings and parents are politically aware and politically active. They believe that New Zealand needs to apply pressure by refusing to trade or play sport with South Africa until racial segregation ends.

The transition from a small private single sex school to the largest high school in our city, which is co-ed and has recently abolished school uniform, is accompanied by cultural shocks. After leaving my beloved primary school I'd entered the restrictive controlled environment of a segregated school, where attendance at Chapel was compulsory and religion was taught as a subject called "Divinity"...
